CHILD LABOUR

One of the most advance negative effects of the sugarcane growing industry in Luuka District is the exploitation of children. Most children in the area work as laborers on the plantations either planting or cutting sugar cane. This has led to increased school drop outs in the area.
Children as young as 4 are used in the plantations to collect and bundle up the cut sugarcane and make it ready for transportation.

Due to the increased demands for land in the area for sugarcane growing and the influx of business actors who acquire land to grow sugarcane on a massive scale, land conflicts within Luuka District are rampant which have fueled domestic violence and family disintegration. The RDCs office noted that 80% of the cases reported to his office relate to land conflicts.
CHILDREN ARRESTED

School going young boys apprehended while cutting sugarcane sit on the floor of a police station in Luuka District. The OC Police cautioned and released them. Such cases are rampant in the district.
Turning to the camera, a woman explains to the UCCA team the genesis of the land conflict. She caught her sister-in-law (background in brown skirt) harvesting her sugarcane.
Land in Luuka District is a scarce resource as far as its availability for food production is concerned. Nearly all families are engaged in sugarcane growing leaving little or no land at all for food production. Women complain that men lease out all the land leaving none to grow foods for consumption. Malnutrition levels in the district are high.

Luuka Districts ranks among the worst performing districts in education. This is largely attributed to the sugarcane growing industry in the district which has affected most of the sectors. Children no longer attend school. The School heads said they experienced challenges in trying to keep children in school. When these children are assured of daily income, some see no reason to stay in school.
ACCESS TO EDUCATION

Some companies have supported the community in the area. The local authorities noted that Kakira Sugar periodically undertakes road repairs. They have also built a laboratory for the local secondary school. However, it is noted that this is not a bar to accountability and respect for human rights. A Company’s responsibility to respect human rights goes beyond voluntary principles of CSR.
